

2013 ICAS WRITING

Shailesh Vasandani
Hale School
Western Australia

Persuade the students in your year level to elect you as their leader.

Barrack Obama became the world's first black U.S. president. People everywhere were shocked. But the real surprise came when he was elected as president again. I ask you, how did someone who represented a minority in his country eventually become the leader of his country? Was it because of his social life? No. Was it because of his family? No. It was because of him. He had the qualities of a great leader. He was honest, generous, trust worthy, and everything else people would want to see in their president. I tell you now, I, too, have those qualities. Ask me about something, I will be honest. Ask me for something, I will be generous. Elect me as your leader, and I will be trust worthy.

Our school is a hub of learning, where children grow to become adults, and where the future generation of our race is nurtured. Because of this importance, a leader must recognize the rights and responsibilities of every individual, including himself. Now I ask you, who better to take on this role than me? I have joined various gatherings, met multitudes of people, and, most importantly, I see you as a person, with a name, and a face. Each and everyone of you is a complex individual, with the right to learn, and the right to be safe. You are not a number.

In conclusion, electing me as a leader will give me the opportunity to create a better, safer, and more enjoyable school, so that all of us achieve the best that we can.